How is it possible for one to edit pictures with programs like Elements, when they are so similar to Photoshop? The answer is that Photoshop Elements is a tool that does most of the work for you. Things such as image correction, color correction, masking, and alignment. These are the most basic editing and manipulation tools that almost every Photoshop user needs. While Photoshop and its Elements version deal with much more than these features, they are often helpful. Elements versions come in two versions: Express and Standard. To learn which version is best for you, you'll need to take a look at the tasks you do the most. Applications such as Instagram and other social media apps, editing for print and publishing, as well as work on large-scale projects such as web sites and brochures, all benefit from a graphic editing program with advanced features. These features can transform the common image into a piece of art in no time. And it is also ideal for beginners. The simple workflow and the good performance makes it a good tool for beginners and novices. We list below some of the most common tasks that Elements can help you with. But when it comes to photo editing, Photoshop comes a bit short. A common task for graphic designers and image editors is to rotate their photos. These can be done in Photoshop by rotating the image or in Elements by using the Transform tool. Below, we have included a small tutorial on how to do a basic rotation in Photoshop. Step 1: Open your photo Let's start with opening your photo. To do this, simply double click on the picture, or select it in the file browser and double click. Step 2: Choose Rotate Tool The next step is choosing the Rotate tool. This tool allows you to rotate the image you are editing around the corner. However, you'll notice that the rotation is not as precise as that found in Photoshop. To increase precision, click on Object Tools in the bottom right corner and click on Anchor Point. A cursor will appear and you can rotate your image by clicking on the objects in the image. Once you have the desired rotation, you can click the Duplicate button. Step 3 a681f4349e

Hurricanes face endless challenges to survive in Florida's Atlantic. But you can help these adorable residents find homes, even if it means overcoming a seaside opponent. A new program by the National Wildlife Federation is available to help homeowners and businesses protect native wildlife in their backyards. The Herald-Tribune reports that if your yard does not fit the new size requirements, you can still "sign up" for a "Get a Gator!" membership that will help protect vulnerable wild animals in your community. The program, starting in Miami-Dade County, will have a team of people who monitor designated lands and issue tickets to people who violate the new wildlife rules. In the program's first year, an estimated 300 pigs, birds and snakes will be relocated to areas where it's more appropriate for them to be. If there are large enough populations, the FWC can also begin to remove the nuisance animals from the wild. The policy change marks a new phase for wildlife managers on the front lines against nuisance wildlife. According to the National Wildlife Federation's website, it's estimated that about 1 in 10 Americans has an interaction with a wild animal, such as a snake on the pathway or a pig in the yard. Each year, the FWC creates a list of species that are invasive or are a real nuisance in the community. In the most recent round of updates, the list included alligators, white ibis, New World pigs, Burmese pythons, northern map turtles, shorebirds and spiny-cheeked bats. According to the Miami Herald, Miami-Dade has a long history of feral pigs and raccoons. In 2009, the FWC received a report about a tenacious raccoon that officials believe was illegally feeding on a sport fish in the Everglades. The animal, dubbed "the raccoon taxicab," escaped from its owner, rode a skateboard to a Dade County lake and swam to safety. To protect wildlife on area properties, golf courses and neighborhoods throughout Florida, the FWC recently held "Wildlife Control Week" to educate the public and persuade residents to take steps to make their property wildlife-friendly. The FWC's website says, "Beginning in 2016, the FWC will issue non-compliance fines of up to $500 for repeat violations of our wildlife regulations. Fines will not be issued in cases of first-time violations. Unfortunately, when it comes to feral pigs
