We describe a novel method for the continuous measurement of the release of nitric oxide (NO) from cells. Nitric oxide synthase (NOS) generates NO at a rate that can be measured by a colorimetric assay for the conversion of oxyhemoglobin to methemoglobin. The inhibition of platelet aggregation by NO can be detected in real time because platelet aggregation requires that NO be released from cells and act on platelets before the onset of aggregation. This new assay will facilitate further investigations into the mechanisms by which NO interacts with cells.We are a team of young, passionate web and mobile app developers who have a strong background in building and enhancing websites, mobile applications and on-site marketing materials.
