xpressmusic. When was the last time that you ate a bowl of cereal for breakfast? Or a glass of water or maybe a fresh orange juice. No, I am not talking about the sugary goodness of breakfast, I am talking about the “real” breakfast that you take for granted every day. We have been told for many years to eat a healthy diet, to consume the right amount of nutrients and a healthy lifestyle. Well, the message that we are getting from the media is that we are in fact eating too much. This is probably a generalization, but I think that the problem is how we are currently measuring how much we are actually eating. If we are encouraged to eat less during the day, then we should be encouraged to be more conscious of the amount of food that we are eating. So for the “measurement” of how much we are eating, we have to look at the energy that we are consuming. Of course, that is where the trouble comes in. When we look at the energy that we are consuming, we are only measuring the carbs and fats, we are not counting the protein and fiber that we are actually consuming. According to the Centers for Disease Control, the average American consumes about 500 calories a day. However, most of the time, you can actually lose weight by eating less than this. A lot of the times, if you are able to eat less, you feel satisfied and you also lose weight. This is because you are not consuming as much “unhealthy” calories. The problem with this is that we are not really measuring what we are eating and we don’t realize that we are consuming so much more calories than what we have been told. If we measure our caloric intake by the typical, high calorie foods, we will probably be surprised at the amount of food that we are actually consuming. If we are not familiar with counting calories, then we are not familiar with measuring the amount of food that we are consuming. If we do not know what it really takes to eat healthy, then we will probably end up consuming too much. Another problem with counting calories, is
