. In 2014 I saw the multiplex expansion on Holdsworth Way and was pleasantly surprised to see the old show have been preserved, and that such a great thing should be reopened as soon as possible, and even have a stage installed - all of which helps make this a very special place and an attraction. But you'd still expect this to be a high-quality venue, rather than just a hangar. This is what it is, but it needs a few more bells and whistles. The backstage area is a bit of a dark mess, with a dressing room hardly bigger than a walk-in closet. The enormous stage is dark and cold, with a couple of rickety tables off to the side. The set pieces were rather stark in appearance, maybe not quite up to the standard set at the Royal Albert Hall. There were also a couple of small problems. One of the audience members ended up in the audience seating area which meant that for the entirety of the performance, I was at a bit of an height and had to constantly keep my feet on something. The bar area was also rather low, which was a bit strange after the looming table heights of the main hall, so the audience were all rather hunched over. In terms of sound, the PA is too quiet, almost to the point of being inaudible. This would be hard to fix, as this is a PA full of punters. The biggest problem, however, is the lack of volume. The stage volume should be at a level where it would be audible even if there were about a hundred people in the room with the speakers at the standard setting, so something is clearly wrong. This can't be fixed with the cheap pop-up poles that install the speakers, which is a shame because I think the poles look great. As you can see, the main problem is the lack of volume. And despite the problems, the audience was great. Unlike the poor audience at the Royal Albert Hall, this audience was very, very pleased to have seen something from a pre-era of their childhood that had been holding on to some of its magic - it was a real whooping show. The Mighty Boosh had taken up residence in the place that for me was the most magical place I could have imagined, and it was the place where the old live-action TV show and the film came to life and everything was made possible. I walked out of the place feeling
