Analysis of forebrain and hindbrain sources of evoked potentials in the rat thalamus by dipole and equivalent current dipole (ECD) methods. The rat thalamus is traditionally considered to receive mainly ipsilateral sensory and motor information and to contribute only little to the contralateral transmission. However, in more recent studies, also ipsilateral sensory transmission has been reported. In the present study, multiunit responses in the ventrobasal thalamus were evoked by stimulation of the primary motor cortex in the parietal and occipital lobes in urethane anaesthetized male rats. The cortical source of these evoked potentials was identified with a spherical head model. For the analysis of the somatotopic organization, the results were related to the individual body map of the rat. The amplitudes of the evoked potentials were measured in 16 single units. Their somatotopy was examined for the somatotopic distribution, the sources were determined with three different methods: the dipole model of the equivalent current dipole (ECD), the two-dimensional equivalent dipole model (2D-EDM) and the three-dimensional equivalent dipole model (3D-EDM). The single units were classified according to their somatotopic organization. The results of this study demonstrate that the responses of 60% of all units could be explained by dipoles in the ipsilateral hemisphere. The sources of these evoked potentials were identified as a small ECD with a maximum 1-3 mm distance from the midline. No significant results were found for the 2D and 3D model. The study provides direct evidence for a sensory transmission from the forebrain to the thalamus via the ipsilateral hemisphere. Furthermore, this study allows new insights into the structural organization of the rat brain in terms of somatotopic organization of the subcortical auditory system.

Q: How to override/overload basic arithmetic operations? I have a problem where I would like to override some arithmetic operations like operator+ or operetor- with my own functions. My intention is to use some parameters passed to
